Dear JIWS editors,
Marry Christmas and Happy New Year, 2018.
This is just my follow up email as an inquiry whether my email with article and cv attached as below has been received by editor, so that I know and then could focus on waiting for the reviewers' notes.
Would you please advise me whether my article and cv have been on your desk?
Looking forward to hearing from you.

Hi Atun. I've shared the materials you sent with my colleagues and will get back to you after we discuss whether the book you reviewed is appropriate for our journal, etc. With that said, your review is about 3 times longer than we accept for publication. Yours is 7000+ words and we accept 2500 max.

With that said, if we're wanting to publish your review I'll send you the guidelines and you can re-write it.

Thanks, JM Bodi

Greetings Atun,

I have attached the review of your article to this email and am happy to inform you it was well received! Unfortunately, our August issue is full, but we would like to publish your article in our January 2019 issue so long as you make the suggested edits that are explained in the attached review. It was a well written article, but starts off with a lot of jargon and needs some grammar adjustments. The reviewer was also interested in getting a better understanding of who the Bimanese women are. If you are able to make these revisions and send it back to us with a brief Author bio included, we would be happy to include your article in our January issue.

I just took a quick glance at your article. From what I saw the grammar is not too bad, but if it's possible for you to have a native English speaker look it over, that is always helpful. We are a small journal with very few staff and often do not have the man power to focus on correcting consistent grammatical errors. Hope this was helpful!

Dear Atun,

Greetings of the New Year!

I'm writing because we are in the process of formatting and editing articles for the Jan issue of the JIWS. Your article is formatted and edited; however, I would like to request that you add a paragraph to your conclusion that renders it a bit more robust, in terms of the implications of your data about matrifocality and how your findings are relevant to wider feminist questions about kinship, women's agency and autonomy. You state in your abstract and the paper that the system renders a simple binary between individuality and collectivism overly simplistic, but you don't really address this in the context of feminist thought or anthropological thought in the conclusion. Rather as it is, it's a simplified summary of your larger, very interesting paper. Can you please work on this a bit, and speak to these broader issues and send me the article within about 10 days? Please also take the opportunity to review the article one more time to ensure we caught all edits/typos etc. and it's in good publishing shape. Please do not change the formatting.

Looking forward to hearing from you.

Best,

Diana

Dear Diana,

I have read the article and did not find some overlooked mistakes. And here I pasted one paragraph that you requested. I did not put it directly to the article, worrying if it can alters the format.

Please kindly find as follow:

Concluding remarks

The article has rendered more nuanced comprehension of women's agency as a site where individuality and communality may overlap. As women can exercise their personal autonomy within the group's interests, collective solidarity upholds them to pursue their individual goals. Collective agency, thus, is a particular method of performing capacity to act which frequently, if not always, occur in a society where the involvement of family, relatives, and public into personal matters is "local logics of good." Therefore, it is essential to link the methods and sources of agency which has been absent from feminists attention in the existing literatures.

Thank you Atun. This is what I was looking for. I've long thought that the binary between individual agency and collectivism was too polarized in the literature (certainly not reflective of what I've learned in my own fieldwork); this is a valuable article and contribution.

Hi Atun—just wanted you to know that I edited the concluding paragraph slightly for grammar and shifted the wording in a few places just a bit to the following, which I think makes it a bit more forceful:

Finally, with respect to this article's broader aims for impacting feminist thought, I have here rendered a more nuanced comprehension of women's agency as a site where individuality and communality may overlap. As women can exercise their personal autonomy within the group's interests, collective solidarity upholds them, enabling women to pursue their individual goals. Collective agency, thus, is a particular method of performing the capacity to act, which frequently, if not always, occurs in a society where the involvement of family, relatives, and the public into personal matters is a "local logics of good." Therefore, it is essential in feminist methodology and theorizing, to link together the methods and sources of agency, which have been absent from feminists attention in the existing literatures.
